

Metamorphoses: “a profound change in form from one stage to the next in the life history of an organism, as from the caterpillar to the pupa and from the pupa to the adult butterfly.”

I have felt at times in my life that I can sense myself, and those around me, changing. Dreamlike, there is a life process which requires a physical and mental bridge between innocence and maturity. Inevitably as we grow wings, we lose our downy feathers.

I want to use photography to document the human struggle with innocence, using my own experiences from girlhood to illustrate my reflection on the unstoppable process of growing up. As the saying goes, “we want what we can’t have...” and the desire to lose and win back innocence is the childhood game we play that always takes a lifetime.
